6. Beginning February 9, the second phase of Census 2011 — the largest of its kind — is slated to witness 2.7 million enumerators and supervisors map an estimated 1.2 billion people across the length and breadth of the country. The three-week exercise promises to be significant in terms of massive volume of data collected as also in terms of quality of information. From adopting a female pan-Indian face as mascot to roping cricketers and actors as Census 2011's brand ambassadors, efforts have been made to give the exercise a modern outlook.

In content too, the approach is to keep step with the times, focusing on gender sensitivity and inclusion. It is welcome that the Census will make no assumptions about anyone's faith or mother tongue. Every individual will provide such data independently of the head of the family, and can even choose 'no religion' or specify a faith outside the country's six major religions. Similarly, relationships in modern society do not always fit conventional moulds. So, those separated will have a different code to distinguish themselves from those divorced and live-in couples can describe their relationship as 'never married', 'friend', or 'unrelated'.

A major first gender would not be enumerated according to male/female categorisations alone. A separate category 'others' has been created for transgender and non-heterosexuals. In fact, enumerators have been instructed to accept whatever gender identity the respondent chooses to mention. If sex workers will fall under 'others' instead of 'beggar' as was the case earlier, 'illegal immigrants' will be enumerated without mention of their nationality. From a headcount of the homeless to data garnering on ownership of mobile phones, computers and internet connections, Census, 2011 has an impressively broad sweep.
